CRYPTO &amp; COFFEE

Following the bullish comments from China, expectations were rife that the move would spur on new money into the ecosystem and yet, by the end of the trading week, the bid tone all but disappeared.

However, given the looming deadline for Ifinex to perfect its appeal as it seeks to have the NYAG case against it dismissed, it is no surprise that volumes are yet to pick up. This is of course barring unexpected events such as the aforementioned comments from China which were attributed to the short squeeze the previous week when Bitcoin traded up 30%. Still, despite the cautious sentiment and falling USDC reference rates, the contango structure remains in place and well supported.

Looking elsewhere, after recently imposing limits on US dollar purchases, the Central Bank of Argentina (BCA) announced citizens are prohibited from using credit cards to buy Bitcoin (BTC) or other cryptocurrencies.

As a result, according to data taken from local cryptocurrency exchange Ripio, Bitcoin is trading at a large premium in Argentina, which was as high as 30% at one point. Similarly, DAI is trading at a high premium relative to the rest of the market.
